CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

OF

THE COUNCIL OF STATE,

Which establishes the kingdom of Hayti.

The State Council, assembled for the purpose of deliberating on the necessary changes to be made in the Constitution of the state of Hayti, for the better regulation of government.

Considering, when the Constitution, formed the 17th of February, 1807, was proclaimed to the world, the state, literally speaking, was without a social compact, and the threatening storm of a violent civil war arising, made it impossible for the representatives of the people to fix, irrevocably, upon a mode of government, suitable to the people's wishes.

And such a constitution, imperfect as it was, and the representatives themselves did not dissimulate with regard to its imperfection, answered the crisis, in which it sprung up, its cradle surrounded by storms.

But the small number of sublime principles it contained, was, nevertheless, sufficient for the people, as it fixed all the rights of the people, in those lamentable times.

Considering that now, thanks to the genius of the supreme Magistrate who holds the reins of state, the high conceptions and the bright valor whereof caused to restore order, happiness and prosperity.

The flourishing state of cultivation, of commerce and navigation, the re-establishment of customs, of morals and religion, the high established discipline both in the army and navy, seem to promise an eternal continuance to the state.

That it is expedient to day more so than ever to establish an order of solid and lasting things, the mode of government which must for ever govern the country who gave us the existence.

Considering that it is urgent to confer the sovereign authority with an august grand qualification that may render the idea of the majesty of the power.

That the erection of a hereditary throne is the necessary consequence of that powerful consideration.

That the rights of inheritance of power to the only male and legitimate children (to the perpetual exclusion of women). In an illustrious family, constantly devoted to the glory and to the happiness of the country which owes him its political existence, is as much a duty as it is a noble mark of national gratitude.

That the nation who at this instant, is, by our means using her will and sovereignty, by trusting them to him who has raised her from the abyss and from the precipice where his most inveterate enemies would have destroyed her, to him who now governs her with so much glory, that this nation has nothing to fear from its liberty, its independence and its happiness.

That it is likewise convenient to establish grand dignities, as much to elevate the splendor of the throne, as to reward signalised services rendered to the country, by officers who are devoted to the happiness, the glory and the prosperity of the state.

The Council of State pass in consequence the following organic law :

TITLE THE FIRST.

OF THE FIRST AUTHORITY.

ART. 1. The President HENRY CHRISTOPHE is declared King of Hayti, by the name of HENRY.— This title, his prerogatives, his immunities, will be hereditary in his family, in the males and legitimates offsprings in direct line, by the right of primogeniture, to the exclusion of women.

2. All acts of the Kingdom be in the name of the King, promulgated and published under royal seal.

3. For want of male children in direct line, the heirship will pass to the family of a Prince the nearest kin to the King or the most ancient in dignity.

4. However it will be lawful for the King to adopt the children of such a Prince of the kingdom as he shall think fit for want of heir.

5. If it should come unexpected to him, after the adoption, of male children, their rights of heir shall prevail upon the adoptive children.

6. At the decease of the King and until his successor be acknowledged, the affairs of the kingdom will be governed by the Ministers and the King's Council, which shall be formed in general Council and who shall deliberate to the majority of votes. The Secretary of State holds the register of deliberation.

TITLE II.

OF THE ROYAL FAMILY. .

7. The Spouse of the King is declared QUEEN of Hayti.

8. The members of the Royal Family will bear the title of Princes and Princesses. They are styled

Most Serene Highness. The heir apparent is denominated Prince Royal.

9. Those Princes are membres of the State Council as soon as they have attained their majority.

10. The royal Princes and Princesses cannot be married without the authorisation of the King.

11. The King makes the organisation of his Palace himself in such a manner according to the dignity of his crown.

12. There shall be established, by the King's orders, Palaces and Castles in the parts of the kingdom he shall think fit to design.

TITLE III.

OF THE REGENCY.

13. The King is minor to the age of full 15 years; during his minority, he shall be named a Regent of the kingdom.

14. The Regent shall be at least full 25 years old, and be chosen among the Princes the nearest in kin to the King (to the exclusion of woman) and for their want, among the Great Dignitaries of the kingdom.

15. For want of a Regent's designation by the King the Grand Council will design one in the manner which is prescribed in the preceding article.

16. The Regent exercise until the full age of the King, all attributions of the Royal Dignity.

17. The Regent cannot conclude any treaty of peace, of alliance, or commerce, nor cause any declaration of war, but after serious deliberation, and by the advice of the Grand Council, the opinion shall be put to the majority of votes, and in case of equality of suffrage, the one that shall be found suitable to the advice of the Regent shall turn the scale.

18. The Regent can neither appoint to the Grand Dignities of the kingdom nor to the offices of General officers of the army both by land and sea.

19. All acts of the Regency are in the name of the Minor King.

20. The Minor King's guard is entrusted to his Mother, and for want of it, to the Prince designed by the deceased King, cannot be elected for the Minor King's guard, either the Regent and his posterity.

TITLE IV.

OF THE GRAND AND PRIVATE COUNCIL.

21. The Grand Council is composed of the Princes of the blood, of the appointed Princes, Dukes and Counts, and at the choice of his Majesty, who himself fixes the number of it.

22. The Council is presided by the King, and when it is not presided by himself, he designs one of the grandees of the kingdom to fill that function.

23. The Private Council is chosen by the King among the Grand Dignitaries of the kingdom.

TITLE V.

OF THE GRAND OFFICERS OF THE KINGDOM.

24. The Grand Officers of the kingdom are the Grand Marshals of Hayti; they are chosen among the generals of all grades, according to their merits.

25. Their number is not fixed: the King determines at every promotion.

26. The places of the Grand Officers of the kingdom are unremovable.

27. When by an order of the King or for reason of invalidity, one of the great officers of the kingdom should come to cease his functions, he shall preserve his titles, his rangs, and the half of his treatment.

TITLE VI.

OF THE MINISTERS.

28. There will be in the kingdom four Ministers by the choice and by the appointment of the King.

The Minister of War and of Marine.

The Minister of Finances and of the Interior.

The Minister of Foreign affairs, And that of Justice.

29. The Ministers are Members of Council and have deliberative votes.

30. The Ministers give in their accounts directly to his Majesty, and take his orders.

TITLE VII.

OF OATHS.

31. At his accession or at his majority, the King takes an oath upon the Gospel, in the presence of the grand authorities of the kingdom.

32. The Regent, before commencing the exercise of his functions takes oath also, accompanied by the same authorities.

33. The tutelars of the grand offices, the grand officers, the ministers and the secretary of state take likewise their oath of fidelity into the hands of the King.

TITLE VIII.

OF THE PROMULGATION.

34. The promulgation of all acts of the kingdom is thus expressed:—

We by the grace of God and the Constitutional Law of the state, King of Hayti to all that are and shall be, GREETING.

Those acts terminates thus as follows:

We send and order that the present, drawn up with our seal, be addressed to all administrative courts tribunals and authorities, to be transcribed in their registers, observed and caused to be observed in the whole kingdom and the minister of justice is directed with the promulgation.

35. The executory expeditions of judgements of courts of justice and tribunals, are digested as follows : We by the grace of God and the state constitutional law, King of Hayti to all that are and shall be GREETING.

Follows the copy of the decree or sentence :

We command and order to all Huissiers on this request, to put the said judgement in execution, to our procurors near the tribunals to see it done ; to all our commanders and officers of the public force to give assistance, when legally required.

IN WITNESS whereof the present judgement has been signed by the President of the court and the recorder. Done by the State Council of Hayti, at the Cape Henry, the 25th of March 1811, eighth year of independence.

THE COUNCIL OF STATE,

To the People and to the Army of Hayti, both by Land and Sea.

FELLOW-CITIZENS,

Your proxies have again assembled for the purpose of revising the constitution of Hayti, of February 17, 1807, 4th year. Having to decide with authority upon your dearest interests, they have effected it with all the zeal, the patriotism they are susceptible. In order to answer your trust, they have sent for the most enlightened Haytians to join them; they have brought to maturity, in the quietness of a cabinet council, the form of government suitable to the country who has brought us into the world; they have never lost sight of your happiness, to which theirs depends; they present you with the fruit of their application.

When the state, threatened by conspirations that were forming in her bosom, and moreover excited by our most cruel and exasperated enemies, presented the image of jolt and of a general confusion, the Great Man who governs us felt the necessity of a social compact, around whom the Haytians could unite, for whom the name of the country Patria is not a vain title; he called us together: we met with eagerness to favour his views, and to offer you with the code of laws we had determined upon. We did not at the time dissimulate that this work was not entirely finished; we thought that the principles we had proclaimed could at least answer for the times of crisis in which we found ourselves; and seeing the storms roaring around the vessel of state, we stayed then to exercise the revisal of our work, to perfect it and to adapt it the better yet to our usages, to our laws, to our morals. In this flattering hope, we were waiting, that the roaring of storms should be at an end, the heavens being more clear should permit us to resume our work.

Thanks to the tutelary genius of Hayti, thanks to the Supreme Magistrate, thanks to his high conceptions, to his brilliant valor, to his courage, to his activity, victory, faithful to his military exploits, has under his standards, calm revived, order is restored, discipline is recovered in the army and navy, conspirations are smothered, conspirators punished, justice has resumed its course, moral and public instruction are improving, cultivation and commerce have been meliorated; at last happiness and prosperity have made their appearance again, and promise the state perpetuity; we have thought the happy opportunity offered to improve institutions we had but the first draught made, and we have exclaimed: The times are come!

To guard against us from those frequent concussions, from those horrible convulsions that have so often agitated and overthrown the political body, to put a stop to the flood and ebb of passions, to the under-hand dealing of intrigue, to the rage of factions and to the re-action of cabals; in one word, to avoid for ever that jolt, that confusion and that perpetual shock which is the result of those monstrous associations known by the name of Popular Bodies; we have felt the necessity of an only Chief in the mighty hands of whom there should be no more bruising; our hearts have been in analogy with those of the people and the army, who have understood that the government of an only one is the most natural, the less subject to vexations and disasters, and the one which unites to the supreme degree the power to maintain our laws, to protect our rights, to defend our liberty and able to cause us to be respected abroad.

But it was but little to bestow the sovereign authority with a grand, imposing qualification, that would bear the idea of the majesty of the power, that would inspire that inseparable respect of the royal authority, and that should give all the latitude possible to do good, in acknowledging but the law above his will; it was yet required, in case of the throne being vacant, to consider the means the most proper to prevent civil insuperable quarrels, to maintain peace and fixity of the political body; and the hereditary succession has appeared to us the most suitable to answer that important end.

Going from those lofty considerations to essential others, to surround the splendor of the majesty of the throne, we have applied ourselves to the institution of a hereditary nobility, the honor of which be the characteristic, whose fidelity be able to stand all test, whose devotedness be without limits, who may know how to live, conquer or die for the support of that throne, from whom it draws its first brightness.

We have analysed the power, the attributions and the denominations granted in every part of the earth, to those superior beings, evidently born to command his equals, and holding in this world (here below) a portion of the Divinity's dominion to whom they are accountable for all the goods and evils which result from their administration, and by the application which we have made of those which have been succeeded in the government of our island, since we have taken up arms to maintain our rights, and finally since the expulsion of our enemies and the proclamation of our independence, we have acknowledged that the title of gov. gen. given to the pious, to the virtuous general in chief Toussaint Louverture of glorious memory, and then primitively to the immortal founder of independence, could by no means become the dignity of the supreme magistrate, as it would appear that such a denomination was only good at the most for an officer in the pay of some power or other; on the other side, the magnificent title of emperor given to general in chief Dessalines, although worthy of being offered to him, for the eminent services which he had rendered to the state, to his fellow-citizens, was wanting for accuracy in his application. An emperor is understood commanding to other sovereigns, or at least so elevated on qualification, supposes to him who possesses it not only the same powers and the same authority, but yet the real and effective dominion of the territory, of the population, &c. &c. &c. and finally the momentary title of President given to his successor the Great HENRY, our august chief, does not give the idea of the sovereign power, and cannot be applied but to an aggregation of men gathered together for such functions, or to a judiciary body, &c. That the example of the United States, which are governed by a President, cannot change our opinion with respect to the insufficiency of that title; that the Americans having adopted the federal government, can find themselves well, as a new people, with their actual government; we have moreover considered that however we appear to be in the same hypothesis as the Americans, as a new people, we had the needs, the manners, the virtues, and even, we will tell it, the vices of the ancient peoples. From all the imitations of governments, the one who has appeared to us to deserve with more accuracy the preference, is that which holds the intermediary between those who have been put in practice till now in Hayti; we have acknowledged, with the great Montesquieu, the excellency of the paternal monarchical government preferable to other governments. The extent of the territory of Hayti is more than sufficient for the forming of a kingdom; many states in Europe, acknowledged by all established potentates, have not even the same extent nor the same resources, nor the same riches, nor the same population. As for the same warlike ardor and for the martial character of the people of Hayti, we abstain from speaking of it, his glory is known all over the world; and very hard of belief would be those who should doubt of it!*

The erection of an hereditary throne in the family of a great man who has governed this state with so much glory, has then appeared to us a sacred and imperious duty as much as a striking mark of national gratitude. The soundness of his intentions, the loyalty of his soul, are sure warrants that the people of Hayti will have nothing to fear for its liberty, its independence and its felicity. The natural consequence of the erection of a throne was the foundation of an order of hereditary nobility, in which should be admissible all distinguished citizens who have rendered important services to the state, either in the military career, in the magistracy, in that of sciences and Belles Lettres. We have then raised the splendor of the throne by that illustrious institution, which is going to excite a generous emulation, a blind devotedness to the service of the prince and the kingdom.

If it was required to justify our choice, relate examples, we would find many in history. How many great men, mechanics of their own fortune, by the only help of their genius, by the vigor of their energy, have founded empires, at a great distance formed limits, have given to their nation, with the taste of knowledges and the arts, the precious advantages of a society wisely organised. Without going any further, we will relate the striking model of that sort, which just offered to his contemporaries, the extraordinary man, our implacable enemy; that which all thoughts have for objects our destruction, and who is now so entirely reigning in Europe; what was he before the commencement of that famous revolution, by the result of which he owes his rapid elevation. Nothing but a frail reed, the fragil and precarious existence of which was far from foreseeing so high a degree of glory and power. As those who have raised him to the supreme power, we make use of the quality of men, we hold from nature; after having conquered over again our rights, our liberty and our independence, we will establish, in this new world, an hereditary monarchy, and we hasten to fix at last the destinies until now uncertain in this country, by declaring that HENRY is elevated to the sovereign power; that the throne is hereditary in his family, and that the happiness of the Haytians dates from the era of the foundation of the sovereign power in those places.

Fellow-citizens, by placing the fundamental basis of the kingdom we have just erected, we believe to have answered to the high trust you had placed in us. If any envious or pussilanimous detractors should rise against the new Institutions which we have adopted; we would answer them that it is time to break for ever to the semblance of a foolish hope what our enemies may yet entertain. That if those very enemies were not disgusted from the terrible experience they have had; and if in the delirium of their rage, they should bring on our territory, their battalions made thirsty of our blood, let them find at their approach a whole people, who has already made the essay of his force, trained up yet by effect of his divisions and grown familiar with the danger of battles, in arms, ready to dispute them the country they will invade; let them see a famed monarch, the 19th century of which will be honored, so often crowned with laurels of victory, united, surrounded with his faithful nobility, dare dangers, to expire even for the welfare of his people, and bury himself under the ruins of his throne rather than curb under the shameful yoke. Let the fortunate people of the handsome Hayti, so favored by nature, unite around the constitutional law, which the only end of his happiness has inspired us; let him swear to defend it, and then we will be able to dare all the tyrants of the universe.

Fellow-citizens, we will be too well paid for our labours, if, in the warranty of our rights, you find, with all the happiness we have been willing to make you enjoy, new reasons to love the government of our community.
